down and told that unless he confessed to having cut to pieces a saddle belonging to Cisrence Morton, a cripple, that he would be banged. He refused to confess, and was drawn up twice more and nearly choked to death. He was then taken to the house, thrust through the door and left lying on the floor in a half-conscious condition.

lison Norton, of Addison, Vt., are divided to the opinion whether she was dead when placed in her coffin. Mrs. Norton apparently died the other day after an illness of four weeks with the grip. A funeral was held and the body was taken to a private cemetery near Middlebury. Before burial the coffin was opened and the mourners were startled by what they saw. The body had turned partly over in the coffin, the hands, which had been crossed on the breast, had moved, and one arm had been raised toward the head. The fece had a life-like expression and the whole appear-ance of the body was that of one who had ance of the body was that of one who had partially awakened from a trance. The body was immediately removed to the house of friends near by and taken from the coffin. The wise men and and women of the neighborhood exchanged opinions on the strange affair, and the entire population for miles around came to look upon the lifelike corpse. The doctors and the undertaker asserted that the woman was dead. the undertaker asserted that the woman was dead. The wise men and woman were divided in their view, and the neighbors didn't know what to make of it. For three days the body was held while the discussion went on. Then somebody suggested the firing of a cannon would settle whether the woman was dead or only in a trance. The undertaker went over to Middlebury and procured an old smooth bore cannon. The body was brought out and placed on a couch in the front yard. The cannon was fired three times. All the windows in the house rattled, and the heus and geese got a scare from which they have not recovered yet. But the body never stirred. not recovered yet. But the body never stirred. Then they buried it. But the Addison folks haven't got through talking about it yet and some of them still believe the woman was in a transc.

Miss Emily Harding of London are in Washing ton, and yesterday delivered addresses before the Wimodaughsis. These two ladies belong to the rapidly increasing number of modern reformers, the special evil that they attack being the inordi-nate and unnatural desire of human beings to est meat when they are hungry. For six years past Mrs Hawkins and Miss Harding have made it a Mrs Hawkins and miss Harding have made it a point to go without meat, and they claim that they are better off both mentally and physically for their temperance. They believe only in the use of fruits, nuts and vegetables as articles of food. They take the ground that man was not by nature a carniverous animal, and the taste and appetite for meat was an acquired one. They claim, too, that people who do not eat meat do not crave liquor and other stimulants.
